List of illustrations                                      p. xvi
The author                                               p. xvii
Acknowledgements                                         p. xix
Foreword                                                 p. xxi
General introduction                                     p. 1
Opening the gates of Modernity in philosophical, economic and political German thought p. 15
Introduction                                              p. 17
Philosophers put classical political economy on trial    p. 24
Breaking away from the theologians' views on providence  p. 27
Fichte and the criticism of 'liberal hazard'              p. 31
Hegel and the criticism of Fichtean grounds for a closed state p. 42
Hegel and the basis of economic freedom                  p. 50
Sources of German political economy as a building block of national identity p. 56
Conceptual framework that British political economy met in Germany p. 57
On Fichte again: his design of a national state for commercial activities from an economic standpoint fitting Germany p. 60
On Hegel again: ambiguities in his understanding of the freedom of entrepreneurs p. 70
'Nationalökonomie' List's definition of a national system of political economy p. 75
Nonetheless an ode to 'odious capitalism'?                p. 86
Goethe's foresight of the future of mankind through production (on Faust, A Tragedy, Part II, Acts IV and V) p. 87
Sources of political economy in traditional German Cameralism (Kameralismus and Kameralwissenschaften) p. 99
State and business in their respective roles: the point of view of historians on German economic history p. 107
The political economy of mankind and culture: Menschen- und Kultur-Volkswirtschaftslehre p. 117
Introduction                                              p. 119
The national economics of Germany                        p. 126
Historians and economists in early nineteenth-century Germany: towards a new matrix, its sources, methods, products and deadlocks p. 127
The 'Younger Historical School': a needed innovative methodology to escape the deadlocks of Historicism and a long-time inherited goal of influence over economic policies p. 138
The economics of state administration or the governance of 'administered economics' p. 155
The emergence of the notion of 'state of law'             p. 156
The need for a science of administration within the context of an industrial economy and of a civil society p. 163
Schmoller and Stein on 'social monarchy'                 p. 173
Historicism seen as outdated institutionalism, or for whom the bell tolls p. 178
Interpretations of Marx                                   p. 186
Marx and the incomplete criticism of classical political economy p. 189
Marx on 'fair wages' (gerechter Lohn)                    p. 198