Contents

Acknowledgements........................................................................................................ XI
List of Abbreviations.................................................................................................... XIII
Note on Terms and Translation ................................................................................ XV
Introduction .................................................................................................................. 1
  Historical Background and Context of the Birth of Indology as a Discipline .......... 1
  Survey of Literature and Definition of Research Problem .................................... 3
  Goal and Limitations of Present Study ................................................................. 10
1. An Emerging Discipline and the Struggle for a Canon ....................................... 15
  Academisation and its Meaning ............................................................................ 15
  Academisation of Indology in Prussia .................................................................. 18
  The Appointment of Schlegel and Bopp and the Introduction of Sanskrit at the University .......................................................... 18
  Academic Disputes and Disciplinary Canon ...................................................... 27
  Sanskrit and the Classicists ................................................................................. 36
  Theology, Religion and Oriental Studies: towards Institutionalisation at the University of Tübingen ........................................... 40
  Theology and Oriental Studies .......................................................................... 40
  Beginning of Sanskrit at the University ............................................................... 42
  University Politics, Pietism and the Chair of Oriental Studies ......................... 44
  Ewald, Oriental Studies and the Academisation of Indology at Tübingen .......... 53
  Prussia and Württemberg: the Beginning of Indology compared .................... 57
2. State, University and Indology in the Mid-Nineteenth Century ......................... 61
  The first chairs: academic appointments from the 1830s to the 1860s .............. 62
  Schlegel's Legacy and the Establishment of the Chair of Sanskrit at Bonn ......... 64
  Cultural Policy, Vedic Research and Indological Chairs: The Appointment of Albrecht Weber ................................................. 68
  Indology and the History of Religions at the University of Tübingen .............. 76
3. Nation, Empire and Indology ................................................................. 87
   The New Nation and German Studies .................................................. 87
   Indology for the Nation: Academic Appointments and State Control ........ 93
   The State and Appointments in Tübingen in the late Nineteenth Century .... 99
   Sanskrit in the Kaiserreich: A declining Discipline? .............................. 101
   Beyond Comparative Linguistics: Expansion and Specialisation ............. 104
   Growth of Buddhist studies .................................................................. 105
   Challenging the Indo-Germanic Connection: New Traditions of Teaching and Research ........................................ 112
   Indology on the Eve of World War I ..................................................... 117

4. Tools of their Trade, Cultural Property:
   A Brief History of Sanskrit Manuscripts ............................................. 119
   The Importance of the Text .................................................................. 119
   The Early Acquisitions .......................................................................... 121
   The Story of the Chambers Manuscripts .............................................. 126
   The Straight Road to Manuscripts: the Case of the University Library at Tübingen ........................................ 130
   Passage to India: the Acquisition of Manuscripts in the latter half of the Nineteenth Century ................. 135
   The Cost of Culture: the Question of Financial Investment in Manuscripts ........................................ 140

5. The Reception of Indology at the University:
   The Audience of Indology ................................................................... 147
   Size of the Student-Body ...................................................................... 147
   Response to Indological lectures at Prussian Universities: Bonn ............ 148
   The Audience of Indology at Berlin University ..................................... 154
   The Size of the Audience of Indology at the University of Tübingen ...... 161
   Who studied Indology? The Background of Students of Indology .......... 165
   Intellectual Background ........................................................................ 166
   Social Background of the Students of Indology .................................... 174
   The Audience of Indology: an Appraisal ............................................. 181

Conclusion ............................................................................................... 189
Appendix I: Genealogy of Teaching of Indology.............................................. 199
   A. University of Berlin, 1820-1914............................................................ 199
   B. University of Bonn, 1819-1914............................................................. 201
   C. University of Tübingen, 1829-1914 ...................................................... 203

Appendix II: Sources.......................................................................................... 205
   A. Archival Sources.................................................................................... 205
   B. Printed Sources...................................................................................... 212

Appendix III: Bibliography ............................................................................... 219
   I. Articles ................................................................................................... 219
   II. Monographs and Edited Volumes ........................................................ 226
   III. Unpublished Works............................................................................... 234