Contents

List of figures vii
List of contributors ix
Acknowledgements xi

Introduction. Constituting the public: art and its institutions in nineteenth-century London 1
Pual Barlow and Colin Trodd

I. National taste: from élite to public?

1 The paths to the National Gallery 29
Colin Trodd

2 Museum or market?: the British Institution 44
Nicholas Tromans

3 Representing the Victorian Royal Academy: the properties of culture and the promotion of art 56
Colin Trodd

4 ‘Fire, flatulence and fog’: the decoration of Westminster Palace and the aesthetics of prudence 69
Paul Barlow

II. Communal taste: institutional discriminations

5 The Society of Female Artists and the Song of the Sisterhood 85
Stephanie Brown and Sara Dodd
6 The cultivation of mind and hand: teaching art at the Slade School of Fine Art 1868–92
   Emma Chambers

7 An art suited to the ‘English middle classes’?: the watercolour societies in the Victorian period
   Greg Smith

8 ‘The advantages of combination’: the Art Union of London and state regulation in the 1840s
   Duncan Forbes

III. Contradicting tastes: public art, the mass and the modern

9 The National Portrait Gallery and its constituencies, 1858–96
   Lara Perry

10 Consuming empire?: the South Kensington Museum and its spectacles
    Paul Barlow and Shelagh Wilson

11 ‘The highest art for the lowest people’: the Whitechapel and other philanthropic art galleries, 1877–1901
    Shelagh Wilson

12 A ‘state’ gallery?: the management of British art during the early years of the Tate
    Alison Smith

Select bibliography

Index