Globalization, Utopia, and Postcolonial Science Fiction

New Maps of Hope

Eric D. Smith
Contents

Acknowledgments viii

Introduction: The Desire Called Postcolonial Science Fiction 1

1 “Fictions Where a Man Could Live”: Worldlessness Against the Void in Salman Rushdie's Grimus 20

2 “The Only Way Out is Through”: Spaces of Narrative and the Narrative of Space in Nalo Hopkinson's Midnight Robber 43

3 There's No Place Like Home: Domesticity, Difference, and the “Long Space” of Short Fiction in Vandana Singh's The Woman Who Thought She Was a Planet 68

4 Claiming the Futures That Are, or, The Cunning of History in Amitav Ghosh's The Calcutta Chromosome and Manjula Padmanabhan's "Gandhi-Toxin" 98

5 Mob Zombies, Alien Nations, and Cities of the Undead: Monstrous Subjects and the Post-Millennial Nomos in I am Legend and District 9 127

6 Third-World Punks, or, Watch Out for the Worlds Behind You 159

Conclusion: Reimagining the Material 194

Notes 196

Selected Bibliography 229

Index 237