Introduction xi
Cynthia A. Montgomery and Michael E. Porter

Part I Business Strategy

1 The Origin of Strategy 3
Bruce D. Henderson
What business owes Darwin and other reflections on competitive dynamics.

2 How Competitive Forces Shape Strategy 11
Michael E. Porter
Awareness of basic competitive forces can help a company stake out a position in its industry that is less vulnerable to attack.

3 Sustainable Advantage 27
Pankaj Ghemawat
For outstanding performance, a company has to beat the competition. The trouble is the competition has heard the same message. How to keep your edge.

4 Time—The Next Source of Competitive Advantage 39
George Stalk, Jr.
As a strategic weapon, time is the equivalent of money, productivity, quality, even innovation.
5 Getting Back to Strategy  61
Kenichi Ohmae
Strategy isn’t just beating the competition; it’s serving the real needs of your customers.

Part II  Linking Competitive Strategy and Functional Strategy

1 Information Technology Changes the Way You Compete  77
F. Warren McFarlan
As it moves from a strictly supporting role in the back office, computer-based technology offers new and exciting competitive opportunities. Electronic systems can add value to your product and throw your competition off balance.

2 Competing through Manufacturing  89
Steven C. Wheelwright and Robert H. Hayes
American managers know that first-rate production is central to competitive success. Wheelwright and Hayes outline a developmental continuum that identifies the different roles manufacturing can play in achieving strategic goals.

3 Financial Goals and Strategic Consequences  113
Gordon Donaldson
Donaldson demonstrates how a company can check whether its strategic and financial goals are consistent with reality. Such an analysis can better prepare you to make the right trade-offs among conflicting goals and to anticipate what the consequences may be.
Part III  Evolving Nature of International Competition

1 The Competitive Advantage of Nations  135
Michael E. Porter
A four-year study of ten major trading nations sought to separate the fundamental forces underlying national competitive advantage from the idiosyncratic ones. A preview of Porter’s 1990 book on the subject.

2 Tap Your Subsidiaries for Global Reach  171
Christopher A. Bartlett and Sumantra Ghoshal
International subsidiaries should be more than pipelines to move products. Their own special strengths can help build competitive advantage.

3 The Globalization of Markets  187
Theodore Levitt
Companies must learn to operate as if the world were one large market—ignoring superficial regional and national differences.

4 Managing in a Borderless World  205
Kenichi Ohmae
Information has made us all global citizens. Too many managers, however, focus on the customers closest to home. Suggestions for the global manager on how to operate as an “insider” in every market.

Part IV  Corporate Strategy and Firm Scope

1 From Competitive Advantage to Corporate Strategy  225
Michael E. Porter
To survive, companies must understand what good corporate strategy is. Here is a seven-part program that a firm can use to review its approach to strategy.
2 The Enduring Logic of Industrial Success 257
Alfred D. Chandler
To compete globally you have to be big. History explains why.

3 The Core Competence of the Corporation 277
C.K. Prahalad and Gary Hamel
Cultivating core competence does not mean outspending rivals on R&D. Neither does it mean getting businesses to become more vertically integrated; it does mean identifying your competencies and growing them.

4 Beyond Products: Services-Based Strategy 301
James Brian Quinn, Thomas L. Doorley, and Penny C. Paquette
Focus on what gives your company its competitive edge. Outsource the rest!

5 The Strategic Benefits of Logistics Alliances 315
Donald J. Bowersox
When retailers, manufacturers, and logistics service companies team up, everyone wins. A useful anatomy of useful alliances.

Part V The Process of Making Strategy

1 Many Best Ways to Make Strategy 333
Michael Goold and Andrew Campbell
There is no “best way” to manage the relationship between corporate executives and business unit managers. The authors examine three ways to divide such responsibility and their advantages for you.
2 Scenarios: Uncharted Waters Ahead  347
Pierre Wack
How Royal Dutch/Shell developed a planning technique that teaches managers to think realistically about the future.

3 Selecting Strategies That Create Shareholder Value  379
Alfred Rappaport
Accounting-oriented statements may not provide the best criteria for analyzing your business plans. With discounted cash flow analysis as a basis, the shareholder value approach can determine the value-creating prospects for alternative strategies.

4 Crafting Strategy  403
Henry Mintzberg
Strategies are both plans for the future—and patterns from the past. Mintzberg argues that artificial complexity has been piled around the strategy-making process and proposes that we return to some basic concepts.

Part VI  Corporate Governance

1 Eclipse of the Public Corporation  423
Michael C. Jensen
The publicly held corporation, the main engine of economic progress in the United States for a century, has outlived its usefulness in many sectors of the economy. A description of the new organization that is taking its place.

2 Directors' Responsibility for Corporate Strategy  449
Kenneth R. Andrews
A strong argument for involving the board of directors in the development of company purposes and goals.
