The United Nations Commission on Human Rights and the Different Treatment of Governments

An Inseparable Part of Promoting and Encouraging Respect for Human Rights?

Miko Lempinen
PART I  INTRODUCTION ..............................................................................1

1  Background and Objectives of the Study ..............................................1

1.1  On the subject ..................................................................................2
  1.1.1  The Commission is a political body: no more, no less .............3
  1.1.2  The Commission may address different cases differently.....3

1.2  On the purpose and scope ................................................................4
  1.2.1  Defending the politics of human rights .........................4
  1.2.2  Inaction is just as important as action ..........................5

1.3  On sources ....................................................................................6
  1.3.1  Previous scholarly writing ..................................................6
  1.3.2  United Nations documentation .........................................7

1.4  On methodology and structure ......................................................8

PART II  THE EVOLVING INTERNATIONAL CONCERN OVER
HUMAN RIGHTS ..................................................................................11

2  The Commission on Human Rights and its Politicization ..................12

2.1  The Commission’s composition and status ....................................13
  2.1.1  The Commission’s composition .........................................13
  2.1.1.1  Yet another body composed of governments .............14
  2.1.1.2  The equitable geographical balance ..........................19
  2.1.1.3  Is there a need for additional membership criteria? ....24

  2.1.2  A functional commission or a Council on Human Rights? ....31

2.2  From inaction to selective action ..................................................34
  2.2.1  The self-inflicted denial of power: following the path of wisdom? 35
  2.2.1.1  Attempts to influence the doctrine of impotence .........36
  2.2.1.2  Views defending the inaction ..................................40

  2.2.2  Abandoning the doctrine of inaction .............................42
  2.2.2.1  Confusion as to where the authorization derives from ....43
  2.2.2.2  Utmost selectivity amounting to a new form of inaction? ...50

2.3  Conclusion: a Commission always corresponding to the prevailing political will ....54

3  From National Interests to an International Concern and beyond .......60

3.1  Human rights become an issue of international concern .................61
  3.1.1  The right to deal with violations of human rights ...............62
  3.1.1.1  What amounts to intervention? ................................65
  3.1.1.2  Matters essentially outside domestic jurisdiction ...........69

  3.1.2  A duty of states to address human rights violations? ........74
  3.1.2.1  The responsibility to protect .....................................75
  3.1.2.2  Obligations towards the community of states as a whole ..77
3.2 An increasing attention on human rights

3.2.1 Human rights in the foreign policy of states

3.2.1.1 Balancing between the clergyman and the merchant

3.2.1.2 From restraint to an active human rights policy

3.2.2 Evaluating the influence of foreign human rights policy

3.2.2.1 The impotent superpower and the potent small state?

3.2.2.2 The socialization process: internalizing international norms

3.3 Conclusion: re-defining the national interests of states

4 State Cooperation with the Organization

4.1 The obligation of states to cooperate with the United Nations

4.1.1 The obligation to cooperate with the Commission and its procedures

4.1.1.1 A restrictive interpretation

4.1.1.2 The more progressive interpretation

4.1.2 The need to distinguish between different levels of cooperation

4.2 Conclusion: the rising political cost of non-cooperation

PART III RESPONDING TO VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS 1: MORE THAN MERELY PUBLIC CONDEMNATION

5 Selectively Placing Governments under Scrutiny: The Confrontational Approach

5.1 Scrutinizing human rights violations (in some parts of the world only)

5.1.1 Country-specific resolutions on violations of human rights

5.1.1.1 Ending scrutiny despite continuing human rights concerns

5.1.1.2 Failure to defend ally from extraordinary scrutiny

5.1.1.3 From thematic to country-specific scrutiny

5.1.2 Statements on violations of human rights

5.2 Inaction as a form of action

5.2.1 Cases ignored, rejected or where the dealing is embarrassingly delayed

5.2.1.1 A case of mass killings ignored

5.2.1.2 Refusal to deal with a case

5.2.1.3 An embarrassingly late response

5.2.2 Challenging the use of the procedural motion of no action

5.2.2.1 Confusion as to the purpose of the procedural motion

5.2.2.2 The Commission's colourful but inconsistent practice

5.3 Who scrutinizes whom?

5.3.1 A rather one-sided form of action

5.3.1.1 The West as the initiator

5.3.1.2 ...and the "rest" as the target

5.3.2 Preference for a regional solution

5.3.2.1 The African approach to African situations

5.3.2.2 Cooperation with Latin American initiatives only

5.3.2.3 An Asian view on human rights protection

5.3.3 From a "clash of ideologies" to a "clash of civilizations"

5.4 Conclusion: is scrutiny always about selectivity?
6 The Country-Specific Resolution

6.1 The purpose of a country-specific resolution

6.1.1 Promoting and encouraging respect for human rights

6.1.2 Maintaining the credibility of those taking the initiative

6.2 The adoption of a country-specific draft resolution

6.2.1 Consensus without agreement

6.2.2 Measuring the level of confrontation

6.3 The significance of a country-specific resolution

6.3.1 The legal significance

6.3.2 The political and moral significance

6.3.3 The importance of even a rejected draft resolution

6.4 Conclusion: a means or an end in itself?

PART IV RESPONDING TO VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS 2: BALANCING THE HUMAN RIGHTS DISCUSSION

7 Avoiding Confrontation: The Thematic Approach

7.1 Responding to country situations thematically

7.1.1 The fate of the missing and disappeared: The case of Argentina

7.1.2 Religious intolerance: The case of Eastern Europe

7.1.3 Racism and racial discrimination: The case of Western Europe

7.2 Insufficient attention on economic and social rights

7.2.1 The call for one rapporteur

7.2.2 Tackling the imbalance

7.3 Conclusion: how a weakness turns into a strength

8 The Commission and its Subsidiary Mechanisms: The Objective Approach

8.1 The Sub-Commission on the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights

8.1.1 Efforts to define the Sub-Commission's task

8.1.2 A contribution to the handling of country situations?

8.2 The System of Special Procedures

8.2.1 No country is immune from scrutiny

8.2.2 Can special procedures influence the Commission?

8.3 Certain Concerns over the Independence of Experts

8.3.1 Independence and special procedure mandates

8.3.1.1 The selection of a mandate holder

8.3.1.2 The tenure of a mandate holder

8.3.2 Independence and the members of the Sub-Commission

8.3.2.1 Efforts to define the qualifications for members

8.3.2.2 Is the concern justified?

8.3.3 Independence vis-à-vis the Commission on Human Rights

8.3.3.1 Correction of a report

8.3.3.2 Conditions for a visit

8.3.4 The code of conduct for experts on mission

8.3.4.1 The need for a code of conduct
8.3.4.2 The interest of the United Nations ................................................. 288
8.3.4.3 Instructions concerning the performance of duties .......................... 290
8.3.4.4 The role of the media ................................................................. 291

8.4 Conclusion: Is there anything objective in the objective approach? ........ 294

9 Attempts at Cooperation: The Dialogue Approach .................................... 301

9.1 Human rights dialogues ......................................................................... 302
  9.1.1 Replacing confrontation with dialogue 1: The case of China ............... 304
    9.1.1.1 The confrontation: Fighting the procedural motion ..................... 306
    9.1.1.1.1 The “fairly consistent” common European position .................. 312
    9.1.1.1.2 The Sub-Commission: success with modesty? ......................... 315
    9.1.1.2 The dialogue: Serious and constructive or toothless and ceremonial? ................................................................................. 321
    9.1.1.2.1 Criticism of the dialogue ....................................................... 324
    9.1.1.2.2 The difficult coexistence of the two approaches ..................... 326
  9.1.2 Replacing confrontation with dialogue 2: The case of Iran ................. 333
    9.1.2.1 The confrontation: Ignorance and non-cooperation ..................... 334
    9.1.2.1.1 Formulation of the concern ................................................... 337
    9.1.2.1.2 Different phases of cooperation ............................................. 339
    9.1.2.2 The dialogue: part of a more comprehensive approach ................ 344

9.2 Statements by the Chair ....................................................................... 346
  9.2.1 Profiting from the willingness to cooperate: The case of Colombia .... 347
  9.2.2 Between confrontation and dialogue: The case of Chechnya ............... 349

9.3 Advisory services and technical assistance ............................................ 351
  9.3.1 Readiness for a genuine dialogue: The case of Guatemala ............... 352
  9.3.2 Escaping the confrontational scrutiny: The case of Burundi ............... 356

9.4 Conclusion: Is the dialogue only a monologue in disguise? ................. 358

PART V CONCLUDING OBSERVATIONS ...................................................... 367

10 The Commission on Human Rights at the age fifty-nine ......................... 367

10.1 More of a forum than an actor? ............................................................ 369
10.2 The politicization of human rights: is it all that bad? ............................ 372
10.3 A less confrontational form of scrutiny: the unrealistic dream? ............. 378
10.4 The necessary coexistence of “the stick” and “the carrot”? ..................... 381
10.5 Rewriting the future? ........................................................................... 386

Bibliography

Annexes

Annex 1: Country-specific and thematic special procedure mandates established by the Commission on Human Rights between 1967 and 2004