Law's Trace: from Hegel to Derrida

Catherine Kellogg

Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
a GlassHouse book
Acknowledgements vii

Introduction – Law’s Trace 1

Deconstruction is here, now, in America 5
Between politics and philosophy 8
The strategic occupation of the Aufhebung 11
The call of deconstruction 14
Chapter breakdown 16
Fetishism and anxiety 20

1 Deconstruction and representation: tracing the sign 25
The French reception of Hegel 29
Koëve’s Hegel: the case of the missing body 31
Hyppolite’s Hegel: from the phenomenology to the logic 37
Derrida’s Hegel: from the pit to the pyramid and back again 41

2 Translating deconstruction: signing the trace 54
Walter Benjamin and the language of names 57
Suspended over the abyss: the task of the translator 63
Signing the trace 68

3 The messianic without messianism 75
Marx and justice 77
Aristotle and the “now” 79
Hegel’s version of time: from “now” ‘til eternity 81
An(other) time: of ghosts, messianism, and singularity 86
4 Mourning terminable and interminable: law and (commodity) fetishism 96

The haunting of the (qualitative?) commodity 98
“Breaks in gradualness, leaps!” 104
The dialectic of Capital and the Science of Logic 105
The haunting of the law 107

5 Justice and the impossibility of mourning: Antigone’s singular act 112

Glas and the family 115
Hegel and Sophocles’ Antigone 116
The law of law 119
Antigone’s singular act 122
“The law of law, always in mourning” 129
Justice-law and a fantasy of sexual complementarity 131

6 Generalizing the economy of fetishism 138

Freud’s fetish 140
Playing two scenes at once 143
Feminism and deconstruction 145

Conclusion 155

End of metaphysics: “who is the friend?” 156
Rogues, democracy, and autoimmunity 160

References to the conclusion 165

Index 167