Contents

ABBREVIATIONS

PREFACE

INTRODUCTION
The ascending and descending themes of government

PART I: THE POPE

1: INTRODUCTION
The historian and the medieval papacy — The requirements of a correct historical approach — The nature of the source material — The Archives — The evaluation of the sources

2: FOUNDATIONS
The theme of papal primacy — The totality of the Christian — The concept of the Church — Its social nature — The prerequisites of government: scientia and potestas — The language of the law — The Roman model — The principle of succession — Pope Leo I’s theme — The letter of Clement I — Its significance — The principle of hierarchical ordering — The pope not a member of the Church and forming an estate of his own — The separation of office and person — The derivational theme — The vicariate of Christ — The principle of monarchy

3: THE SECULAR PRINCE AND PAPAL LAW
The papal auctoritas — The principle of gratia — The mediatory principle — Exemplification through papal documents — Papal grace and disgrace — The standing of the secular prince — The Pauline roots — The auxiliary function of the king — The principle of division of labour — The principle of public good (utilitas publica) — The concept of justice — The law — Papal legislation — and theology — The idea of sovereignty — The pope as universal monarch — The nature of the papal law — The principle of usefulness — Deposition of a king — Excommunication of a king — Deposition of a bishop — The setting up of kings by popes — The prince to implement the decrees of the pope — Some illustrations of the practical exercise of papal functions
PART II: THE KING

I. THEOCRATIC KINGSHIP

The king by the grace of God — Theocratic kingship — and descending forms of government — The Pauline background — The royal grace formula — Royal grace and disgrace — The royal vicariate of God — Folk-law (Volksrecht) and Royal law (Königsrecht) — The principle of royal concession — The concept of Munt — The king’s peace — The king not belonging to the people, but forming an estate of his own — The royal theocracy illustrated by the coronation rites — The principle of subjection to the king’s government and law — The subject (Untertan) — No citizens — Where in a case of a vacancy does power reside? — The principle of public good (utilitas publica) — The crime of lese majesté — The concept of high treason

2. LIMITATIONS OF THEOCRATIC KINGSHIP

The pure royal theocracy examined — Its weaknesses — The unction — Indelible character denied to royal unction — The coronation service and the role of the bishops — The coronation promises — The element of Recognition in the coronation service — Royal elections — The royal office an ecclesiastical office — The lack of immunity from ecclesiastical attacks
3: FEUDAL KINGSHIP IN ENGLAND

The feudal function of the king — Medieval feudalism and government — The king as theocratic ruler and as feudal lord — The repudiation of the feudal contract — The dual function of the medieval king — The securing of peace by King Henry II — Criminal jurisdiction in the hands of the theocratic king — King John's exercise of his royal voluntas — 'Due process of law' — The Roman law background — The significance of the Leges Anglorum — Their aim — The feudal decree of Conrad II — The baronial opposition to John and the problems raised — Magna Carta — Its essence — The law of the land as feudal law — The later common law as the third great European system of law — The Statute of Merton — The feudal substance of Magna Carta — and its theocratic clothing — Roman law barred entry into England — The security clause of Magna Carta — Consequences in regard to governmental principles — The community of the realm — Bracton — Analysis of his views — Bracton's gubernaculum and jurisdictio — The concept of the Crown — The Crown a legal union — The Declaration of 1308 — Richard II's conflict with Parliament — The concept of royal prerogative — The coronation oath in the fourteenth century — John Fortescue — English government characterized by a regimen regale et politicum

4: THEOCRATIC KINGSHIP IN FRANCE

French principles of government — compared with English — The curia regis — Composition — The Hôtel du roi — The inquisitorial principle in French judicial proceedings — The protection of the kingdom — The Inquisition introduced — The pays de droit coutumier and the pays de droit écrit — The Roman law in France — The légistes and their influence — The cas royaux — La religion royale — The rex christianissimus — Constitutional principles reflected in the coronation services — Marked differences between French and English coronations — The king in his kingdom an emperor — Beaumanoir — Bracton's contemporary — Paris as the communis patria — The assemblies of estates — The function of the king exemplified in Philip IV's conflict with the pope — The interpretation of the lex regia — The release of popular forces — Feudal kingship in England and theocratic kingship in France
PART III: THE PEOPLE

1: POPULAR ASSOCIATIONS

Populist manifestations — The ‘lower’ regions of medieval society — The communal sense — The association or group — Village communities — Towns — Free unions — The harnessing of the masses to a particular programme — Heretical sects — The Friars — The crusades — Education of lay people — The law schools — No theory of populism 215

2: TOWARDS POPULISM

Contents

3: THE LEGISLATIVE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE PEOPLE
The lawyers and the Roman law — Customary law — Popular usages — The North Italian republican cities — The importance of Bartolus — His juxtaposition of the tacit and expressed consent of the people — The legal sovereignty of the people in Bartolus' thought — The principle of representation in Bartolus — The State — The concept of citizenship — Natural and acquired citizenship — Bartolus and Marsiglio compared

280

4: APPLICATIONS AND IMPLICATIONS OF POPULISM
The Conciliar Movement — an application of populist principles notably of Bartolus and Marsiglio — The legal character of this movement — Governmental principles expressed in it — The ascendancy of the University of Paris — The changing ideas of right and law — Consequences for governmental principles — The law schools and the changing ideas of right and law — The changing concept of justice — Populist writers — Their spread — Their scope — The release of the citizen — Man and the Christian — The lex regia — The service of the Roman law — Changes reflected in the literary scene — The Vitae — Historiography — Portraiture and sculpture — Changes observable from the thirteenth century onwards — Boccaccio and Petrarch — The Renaissance — The re-discovery of Man — Subjectivism — The via moderna

288

APPENDIX

306

INDEX

317

NOTE TO FRONTISPICE
These illustrations are from MS. Ee. 3.59 in the University Library, Cambridge (The Life of St Edward the Confessor). For details, cf M. F. James, La estoire de saint Aedward le Roi (Facsimile edition for Roxburghe Club, Oxford, 1920). Both pictures reproduced by kind permission of the Library Syndics.