

867 337 265

International relations in 2030:
The transformative power of large developing countries

Lauren M. Phillips

Bonn 2008

Contents

1	Introduction: Futurology and its risks	1
2	The status quo: A view of the current world order, from different ends of the IR theoretical spectrum	3
2.1	The realist vision of current international relations and balance of power theory	4
2.2	The world through institutions: Liberal views of the current world order	5
3	The rise of large developing countries: How far? How fast?	7
3.1	The new drivers of the global economy: BRICS and beyond	8
3.2	New places at the table: The increased political power of large developing countries	11
3.2.1	Changing roles for developing countries in other forums	11
3.2.2	Renewed North-South confrontation?	13
3.3	Risks to the rise	14
3.3.1	Environmental constraints	14
3.3.2	Domestic political concerns	15
3.3.3	International financial stability	16
4	The rise of China	17
4.1	International relations theory and the Chinese threat	17
4.2	Competing paradigms of international relations and the Chinese “threat”	18
5	Contrasting visions for 2030	19
5.1	Conflictual bipolarity	20
5.2	Conflictual multipolarity	22
5.2.1	A unified Europe	22
5.2.2	The rise of other large developing countries	23
5.3	Non-conflictual multipolarity	24
5.4	The fate of the rest	25
5.5	Impacts of new constellations of power on development policy	26
6	Conclusions	27
	Bibliography	29