Just Distribution

Rawlsian Liberalism and the Politics of Basic Income

Simon Birnbaum

Stockholm University
Contents

Acknowledgments .................................................................................................................. 11

1. WELFARE UNIVERSALISM AND THE STUDY OF SOCIAL JUSTICE ..........13
   1.1. Welfare reform, basic income and the universal welfare state .................. 13
   1.2. Competing ideals and the future of welfare universalism ..................... 15
   1.3. The basic income proposal ........................................................................ 19
   1.4. Why do we need a theory? Policy assessment and distributive justice ........ 22
   1.5. Feasibility requirements and ideal theory ................................................ 24
   1.6. Introducing the theoretical landscape: five dimensions of Rawlsian justice ... 29
   1.7. Reflective equilibrium ............................................................................... 35
   1.8. Overview of the argument .......................................................................... 37

PART I.

RAWLSIAN JUSTICE, RADICAL LIBERALISM AND THE CASE FOR BASIC INCOME .......................................................................................................................... 43

2. A RAWLSIAN CASE FOR BASIC INCOME ......................................................... 45
   2.1. Introduction: Rawlsian justice, basic income and the obligation to work .... 45
   2.2. The difference principle and work requirements: initial remarks .............. 47
   2.3. A wider agenda ............................................................................................ 51
   2.4. A Rawlsian case for basic income .............................................................. 53
   2.5. Work, self-respect and the good life ............................................................ 58
   2.6. Perfectionism, liberty and the obligation to work ........................................ 62
   2.7. Beyond the obligation to work? .................................................................. 64
   2.8. Conclusion .................................................................................................... 67

3. STRONG RECIPROCITY VS. WEALTH SHARING: RAWLSIAN JUSTICE, WORK AND THE CONCEPT OF COOPERATION .................. 69
   3.1. Justice as fairness, reciprocity and the notion of wealth sharing ............... 69
   3.2. Social cooperation and the concept of contribution .................................... 70
   3.3. Against the thick account of social cooperation ........................................ 76
   3.4. Wealth sharing and the limits to reciprocity ................................................. 80
   3.5. The liberty-based case for wealth sharing ................................................ 83
   3.6. Conclusion .................................................................................................... 89
PART II.

EQUAL FROM THE START: EXPLOITATION, LUCK AND INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY ................................................................. 91

4. WEALTH SHARING, REAL LIBERTARIANISM AND THE RESTRICTION OBJECTION .......................................................... 93
   4.1. Liberal equality, brute luck and responsibility ................................................. 93
   4.2. The structure of real-libertarianism: basic convictions ................................ 96
   4.3. From value equalisation to basic income ....................................................... 99
   4.4. Williams’ restriction objection: envy-elimination vs. value equalisation .......... 103
   4.6. Independent interests and exploitation ......................................................... 110
   4.7. Technological inheritance and the burden of work ....................................... 113
   4.8. The need for a stability constraint on real-libertarian justice ....................... 117

5. LUCK, JOB ASSETS AND RESPONSIBILITY: UNCONDITIONAL DISTRIBUTION UNDER UNEQUAL TALENTS ....................... 120
   5.1. Real-libertarianism, unequal talents and three debates on responsibility ....... 120
   5.2. ‘Real freedom for all’ and preference responsibility ..................................... 124
   5.3. Preference responsibility and the currency of egalitarian justice .................. 127
   5.4. Undominated diversity, liberty and preferences as parameters of justice ...... 130
   5.5. Job inequalities, internal endowments and the talent-dependency of gifts ...... 132
   5.6. Choice or circumstances? Ambition-sensitivity and job assets ...................... 137
   5.7. A ‘minimal autonomy’ constraint on real freedom? ..................................... 141
   5.8. Conclusion .................................................................................................... 144

PART III.

IS RADICAL LIBERALISM FEASIBLE? NEUTRALITY, INSTRUMENTAL VIRTUES AND THE POLITICS OF BASIC INCOME .... 147

6. WHY DO PEOPLE WORK IF THEY DON’T HAVE TO? LIBERAL NEUTRALITY, BASIC INCOME AND THE WORK ETHOS .......... 149
   6.1. Basic income and the work ethos: exploring an unexpected alliance .............. 149
   6.2. Can the basic income be at once universal, feasible and unconditional? ........ 151
   6.3. The neutrality objection and the case for a weak work ethos ....................... 153
   6.4. The objection from structural exploitation ................................................... 157
   6.5. Structural exploitation, neutrality and the minimal autonomy constraint ........ 162
   6.6. Concluding remarks ..................................................................................... 167
7. RADICAL LIBERALISM AND COMPETING WELFARE-REGIMES:
THE POLITICS OF BASIC INCOME ....................................................... 169

7.1. Radical liberalism in context: attractions and challenges .......................... 169
7.2. The virtues of radical liberalism: work conditionality and the stability of justice .. 171
7.3. Real freedom and the encompassing welfare model ................................ 176
7.4. The challenge of post-productivism ..................................................... 179
7.5. Gender equity and the universal caregiver model .................................. 182
7.6. Competing options for universal caregiving ....................................... 184
7.7. Replacing or reforming the welfare state? ......................................... 189