

Introduction

An emergent global commons: biodiversity - a case study of how culture becomes law and nature becomes empty space

Res Nullius/Terra Nullius and the Epistemic Imaginary of International Law

Terra nullius, res nullius and res communis: a conceptual confusion of terms

Res nullius - the tragedy of the (modern global) commons: from Grotius and the high seas to the internet

Covering res that move: theory and practice: whales as res divini juris

The law of the seas extended vertically into the law of outer space and the law of outer space reterritorializing the Earth

Two Cases of the Revocation of Terra Nullius the Western Sahara case: genealogies captured by the census

Negotiations and the Mabo case: comparative epistemic imaginaries.

Conclusion: beyond empty space - expanding the epistemological repertoire of the global commons through biofigural and technological imaginaries
